Usually a year is a year. Yet business owners and employees seem to regard 2008 as nearly two separate years: before the September financial crisis and after. The ongoing turbulence has undoubtedly taken a huge toll on business confidence. Yet is the current economic climate is also a new opportunity for growth? Governments have started to react, both in Germany and worldwide. Investment programmes are underway, state guarantees in place, and bad banks look set to clear the toxic assets off the books of banking systems. Will we finally write the last chapter in this disastrous story, and see economies on the road to recovery?

Many businesses are confident that the “credit crunch” has allowed them to acquire targets at lower costs, broaden their customer bases and spot opportunities to enter new markets. They’re also striving to reduce loss and improve efficiency. How well placed is your company to capitalise on the market downturn? Join the discussion!
